

Analysis: The two comedians I chose to talk about for the Humorists Study are comedians Kevin Hart and the late Robin Williams. These two successful comedians use very different techniques but still manage to make audiences laugh. With two separate comedic strategies, viewers are still able to form connections with both. Kevin Hart is well known in the comedic industry, as well as being an actor starring in multiple films, such as Jumanji and Ride Along. He is mostly known for his comedic tour, Laugh at My Pain. Coming from a humble background, Kevin Hart is known for his ability to tell and recall stories while using body movements for additional humor. Often using personal experiences, his performances are relatable and engaging to viewers. Using self depreciation, Hart is not afraid to put himself in front of the joke. His content ranges from talking about times with his children, conversations with friends and even strangers. Hart uses various comedic tools such as black humor, blue humor and epigrams. Hart offers a unique freshness and finds ways to connect to his audience.

Another talented humorist, Robin Williams was known for his grandiose acting, however he also was talented in stand up comedy. Using forms of fluctuant voices and accents, he was able to replicate with certain accuracy. This allowed for him to create various characters and personas for entertainment purposes. Robin Williams was also known for his ability to address more serious situations through his humor, often spreading awareness to social issues and problems. Robin's audience was intended for everyone, with a perfect amount of comedy for each age group to comprehend.
