Synopsis - Draft

The scene will start by showing the MC working on their own work, seeming to struggle with what's on the page and seeming quite stressed about it. They have a long list of homework and chores that are half complete. They keep looking at that list of chores and work, looking cold and dismissive, getting more stressed the more they look at it. Their room is cluttered with papers, books and clothes everywhere. Their bed is not made either. Their sibling comes in to give them a note from their mom saying they need to do another chore while also childing them silently that their room is a mess, causing the MC to grow agitated. The MC kicks their older sibling, who is acting dismissive and distant, out of their room.

Leaving the MC to strew in their anger. They then start haphazardly cleaning their room, shoving clothes under the bed, in the closet, under dressers and anywhere they could find so they could make their room look more organized and clean how they know their family would be satisfied with. The MC gets ready for bed. But when they do go to sleep, they have trouble doing so, acting restless to show how stressed they are, never actually sleeping. The next day, the main character is once again trying to work through their long to-do list. They finally get fed up with their older sibling and they start yelling at them. The MC storms out of the room on the verge of tears. After the siblings argue, a montage of the MC getting progressively more tired (eating breakfast, driving to school, not very excited/happy around friends, doing homework, restlessly trying to sleep). The montage ends with the main character falling asleep while doing homework. The older sibling enters with an unusually kind expression and puts a blanket over them before leaving.

The next day, the MC gets back to their work for a little longer before going to a place like a park to calm down and unwind. Their older sibling realizes their younger sibling isn't in their room and goes out to find them. The older sibling finds them sitting on a bench in that park and trying to talk to them, but MC ignores them for a while as if lost in their own thoughts before finally turning to listen to whatever their older sibling wants to say. Later on, they return back home and the older sibling is helping them with math homework. Regular work like cleaning their room together. Their huge list is getting checked off, which eases the stress of the younger sibling, making their mood more happy and cheerful.