

As an artist who has delved into the world of spray painting, I have discovered a dynamic and captivating medium that allows for the expression of raw emotion and creativity. Through the hissing cans and vibrant mists of color, I have found a unique outlet for my artistic vision. Learning the art of spray painting has been a journey of exploration and growth for me. It is a skill that requires patience, practice, and a deep understanding of techniques unique to this art form. From controlling the pressure of the can to mastering the art of blending colors seamlessly, each stroke and spray has taught me valuable lessons in precision and control.

My journey into the realm of spray painting has been both exhilarating and challenging. It's not merely about wielding a can; it's about mastering a complex skill that demands patience, dedication, Yet, amidst the trials and errors that inevitably accompany the learning process, I have come to embrace imperfection as a catalyst for innovation. Rather than viewing mistakes as setbacks, I see them as opportunities to push the boundaries of my creativity and adapt my artistic expression.

When I first started to paint on the blank wooden board I was nervous that it would not turn out the way I wanted, but in reality, nothing is as perfect as you would like it to be. Having the mindset to course correct when I began to have doubts about the outlook in my art. I definitely feel that creating the Eye was the hardest to create as I had to change the whole concept from a whole face but to shrink it down into an eye was definitely for the better. As I could center in on one part rather than dealing with the whole face. Unlike the city skyline, I had more access to videos and tutorials along with my short background spray painting cities. However this process was more challenging as I have never worked on a canvas as big as the board.

Through trial and error, I have learned to embrace imperfections and turn them into opportunities for innovation. I have bent my creative expression to move around problems that have occurred for the duration of my process. Having the access to learn these new profound skills has definitely been a life changing process over the course of my time at Freestyle Academy, and can not express it into words how grateful I am to have had this experience. And can not wait to see where this takes me in the future.
